Mourning for the dead, feeding the living:
mausar khānā

Università degli Studi di Milano

The present paper is meant to introduce a particular Hindū funeral feast, the so-called mausar, paying particular attention to the way it is celebrated by the members of the Kalbeliya caste.

The following analysis is based on extensive fieldwork amongst the members of the Kalbeliya caste who live in a camp on the outskirts of the holy town of Pushkar¹ and, in particular, on the participation in a joint funeral feast held in April 2011 in a temporary camp set up in the Pali district.

A detailed introduction to the cultural and social features of the Kalbeliyas goes far beyond the purposes of the present argumentation, whence, it will suffice to briefly dwell on two elements of their identity.

The first of these is their belonging to a caste of householder Nāths: Kalbeliyas, in fact, consider themselves to be descendants of Kanipāv, one of the nine Nāths, the semi-divine masters of the practice of haṭha-yoga which inspired the nātha-yogin movement and, as such, they are considered to be a caste of householder Nāths. The art of snake charming² is connected to descent from Kanipāv, and this activity with its host of spiritual and devotional meanings constitutes the caste’s traditional money-earning occupation and its main social and cultural characteristic. Since the snake is regarded by many communities, especially in rural areas, as the embodiment of God, Kalbeliyas ‘are regarded as the priest of snake’.³ Up till now Kalbeliyas have always been able to attract donations with a creature which is full of religious symbolism for Hindū people. Snake charming is basically related to religious begging, but, if at one level its nature is highly ritualistic and devotional, it also has a significant, practical

¹. The small town of Pushkar is a famous place of pilgrimage, tīrtha, for Hindūs, and a popular tourist destination, especially for foreign backpackers. side. The Kalbeliyas’ ability in catching the poisonous serpents and also their knowledge and expertise in medicines against snake bites are very useful and even today often preferred over hospital treatment. Until not so long ago, in order to perform both their ritualistic services and their snake related knowledge and expertise, Kalbeliyas had to be constantly on the move: a single village, in fact, would not have been able to provide them with adequate work, while others might not have needed their services, meaning that nomadism was, and partly still is, an economic strategy caused by the limited demand for their services in any one location.5

The Kalbeliyas’ traditional nomadic way of life and their past means of living describe a form of economic, social, and cultural adaptation common to groups defined both as service nomads and as peripatetic peoples.

In India, service nomads are endogamous groups offering highly specialized services, such as entertainment, ritual religious specialties, folk medicines, and repairs of specific types of implements, to settled populations, from whom they derive most of their subsistence.

Nowadays, Kalbeliyas have been shifting from one set of adaptive strategies to others, and the adoption of a new means of surviving has partially modified the structure of their nomadic way of life. We may say that the Kalbeliyas living in the Pushkar settlement are experiencing a change into a kind of sedentarization. Nevertheless, the members of the Kalbeliya community who have been living on the outskirts of Pushkar for approximately 20 years still consider themselves to be members of a ghumakkar jāti, a wandering caste, even if the definition does not exactly mirror their actual life style.

Keeping in mind these two elements of Kalbeliya social and cultural identity, namely, that they are both a caste of householder Nāths and a community of service nomads, let turn to the main topic of the present paper: the mausar.

The mausar is a ritualized funeral feast widely celebrated in Rajasthan by all the Scheduled Castes and the Other Backward Classes. The members of the jātis coupled with the first three varṇas do not perform this peculiar funeral rite, which must not be confused with the mṛtyubhojan, the Hindū funeral feast which concludes the twelve day set of funeral rituals following death. As far as I know, there is no written record of the mausar, both in ancient and in contemporary literature, and it seems that the only two authors who have dealt with it are Jeffrey G. Snodgrass and Shalini Randeria. While Snodgrass described the way the members of another Rājasthānī caste, the Bhats, perform and conceive the mausar, Shalini Randeria studied the Dalit mortuary rituals in Gujarat.

which, in structure and meaning, partly recall the Rājasthānī mausar. The lack of studies on this subject is quite surprising seeing that the mausar is the central rite and the central activity for most Hindū Rājasthānis. Since the mausar is definitely the most important ceremony in the whole social and personal life of the members of the Kalbeliya caste, the present paper means to identify the reasons behind this importance. When a member of the Kalbeliya community living in Pushkar dies, his or her corpse is transported to an area, a few kilometres away from the camp (ḍērā) where the whole group lives. The area in which the dead body is buried fits the local definition of jaṅgal, that is to say, an area not included in fixed and permanent settlements of villages or towns.9

As householder Nāths, it is not surprising that the Kalbeliyas bury their dead: in fact, householder Nāths typically bury their dead together in a separate gravesite, which generally lies just outside the village, neighbouring on the area where they live. The gravesite is usually small, and the dead are always buried without a coffin, generally sitting up in a lotus position like yogis. As D. Gold and A. Grodzins Gold state, the common gravesite of the householder Nāths usually constitutes a concrete reminder of their awesome strangeness as a community.10

Nowadays, the members of the Kalbeliya community living in Pushkar tend to bury all their dead in the same area, which they call qabristān, literally ‘burial-ground’. The first burial, which occurs immediately after the person’s death, is made up of a grave covered by a series of stones as long as the length of an average-sized body lying down. In the past, when Kalbeliyas used to lead an entirely nomadic way of life, their burial places were scattered all over the Rājasthān landscape. The burial is followed by a series of funerary rites that last for twelve days, the so-called barah din. The ‘barah din’ formula consists of a broad and complicated range of rituals, which, as far as the Kalbeliyas are concerned, also includes the interpretation or, better, the divination of the next rebirth of the deceased. The mausar can be considered as being the last and final funeral ritual performed by Kalbeliyas. The mausar can be held in honour of the recent dead, the many years dead, and even before death happens, but it is not held for all the dead members of the caste. The mausar is only celebrated for all the married members of the caste and can be celebrated even when they are still alive. For example, if the husband dies, his wife’s jīvat mausar will also be celebrated along with his mausar, but if the wife should die first, her mausar will only be celebrated when her husband also dies or when her husband decides to celebrate his own mausar (which could in fact be a jīvat mausar). The sons can also celebrate their jīvat mausar together with the mausar of their dead father. In addition, a single mausar can commemorate more than one dead man, but the men must be brothers (with their living or dead wives). Mausars, as well as the barah din, are never celebrated for people who are not yet married, who have not yet chosen their own guru, for children, and for anyone who dies before reaching adolescence.

The Kalbeliya mausar is rarely celebrated immediately after the person’s death: several years usually pass before a mausar is held and the main reason for this delay is that sponsoring a mausar is economically very demanding. Indeed, it takes a certain amount of time for the Kalbeliyas to collect enough money to celebrate it properly. However, the mausar is considered to be such a central, essential, and necessary ritual, that some Kalbeliyas, in fear of the fact that their children and relatives may not hold one or sponsor a minimally acceptable, even perfunctory one after their death, choose to celebrate their own mausar while they are still alive (jīvat mausar).

The close family of the deceased, basically his or her sons and unmarried daughters, is responsible for organizing the mausar after consulting both kinsmen and affines. Nevertheless, it is the prerogative of the community’s elders (pañc) to give permission to host the feast and to supervise its entire organization. When, for example, I asked Rakhi, my dharm bahin and my first and foremost collaborator in the field, if I could take part in her father Galla Nath’s mausar, she had to ask the pañcāyat for permission, which I was eventually granted. Even the date of Rakhi’s father’s mausar, celebrated more than ten years after his death, was fixed a year before (May 2010) its actual happening (April 2011) by the members of the pañcāyat together with Rakhi’s family.

In every Kalbeliya mausar, all the Kalbeliya communities of a parganā must be invited by the family sponsoring the ceremony: for the Kalbeliya community living in Pushkar this rule implies that at least all the Kalbeliya communities who live in the four districts of Ajmer, Mewar, Pali and Nagaur must be invited to the funeral feast. The mausar is more than a simple funeral feast, since it is a rather complex performance, lasting three days, with some six to seven hundred participants: it includes extravagant feasting and food distribution, dancing and singing by men and women, the ostentatious exchange of money and gifts, and the building of a funeral monument. The elaborate ceremony is held on unowned land, generally near the place where the dead person was born or where he or she died, and all the facilities (the big tent-pavilion, mandapa, where people can gather during the day and where all the rituals, meetings, and public speeches are held; blankets; mattresses; drinking water tanks; food; alcohol; matting; chairs; the sound system; microphone, etc.) must be provided by the sons and eventually the daughters of the dead person. Basically, Kalbeliyas pour most, if not all of their earnings, into a single mortuary feast.

It is difficult to give an exhaustive summary of the mausar, but at least two of its rituals are worth describing. The first one is held on the third and last day of the mausar and is called māyrā: during the māyrā the natal kin of each of the married women in the deceased’s household must make a gift of dresses and jewellery to their married daughters. Shalini Randeria\(^\text{11}\) describes a similar transaction, called \textit{maraṇ māmerū}, which is part of life-course ritual celebrations among the Dalits in Gujarat. Randeria states that women’s status in their conjugal families depends in no small measure on the value of the gifts they receive from their natal families at mortuary feasts. It must be remembered that even though Kalbeliya women become part of their husband’s household with marriage, thereby acquiring a new family, their ties with their natal families are not broken. Indeed, the relationship between married women and their natal kin proves to be much stronger and effective than it usually is in Hindū society.

A second noteworthy ritual consists of the placing of a stone slab (\textit{mūrti}) portraying the dead person in a highly conventional way, on the funeral monument which is built, days before the \textit{mausar} celebration, on the first burial. Kalbeliyas call this funeral monument \textit{samādhi} and it must be noted that each \textit{samādhi} corresponds to a \textit{mausar} and not to a person. Since one \textit{mausar} can commemorate more than one person, one \textit{samādhi} can be dedicated to more than one individual. The \textit{samādhi} is basically a sign that a \textit{mausar} has been held. As far as a \textit{jīvat mausar} is concerned, stone portraits are not placed on the \textit{samādhi} until the person dies. As a rule, stone portraits are not provided for women: in some unusual cases a slab will be placed with just a name engraved on it. The highly conventional portrait of the dead person is placed on his \textit{samādhi} during the morning of the second of the three days of the ceremony: the sponsors of the \textit{mausar} and their families move from the camp where the \textit{mausar} is held to the burial place, where a funeral monument, the \textit{samādhi}, has been built on the previous heap of stones which indicates the actual burial ground. The only people to attend and take part in the installing of the portrait on the \textit{samādhi} are the dead man’s widow, any existing sons with their own wives and children, his unmarried daughters, his brothers, and, if they are still alive, his parents. The stone slab portrays a sort of paradigmatic or ideal image of a Kalbeliya man, visually stressing his belonging to the \textit{Nāth sampradāya}. In fact, the depicted male figure bears a striking resemblance to Kanipāv as he is represented in the \textit{mūrti} of the temple on the outskirts of Pushkar, which the Kalbeliyas dedicated to him around fifteen years ago. In both cases, the male figure represented is a young adult male, with a fair complexion, a long, black beard and black moustache, sitting down in \textit{padma āsana}, with a couple of \textit{mālā} beads around his neck and his body completely covered by a pink or orange garment, except for his feet and hands. There are a few differences between Kanipāv’s \textit{mūrti} and the ones placed on the Kalbeliya \textit{samādhis}: while Kanipāv is depicted with long black hair and holding a small plate in one hand and a snake in the other, the \textit{samādhis’} stone slabs portray men wearing turbans of the same colour as their pink or orange garment, holding mālā beads in one hand while their other hand with its open palm facing forward is raised to chest level. This hand reproduces the form of the abhaya mūdrā, a ritual hand pose, common to both Buddhist and Hindū iconography, which denotes the granting of the condition of being without fear, the imparting of calm or reassurance to the soul, and the transmission of protection against harm, generally of a spiritual nature: abhaya mūdrā is commonly held by Hindū deities and is directed at the devotee who falls under the deity’s protection. Along with this highly conventional representation of the dead person, the stone slab also reproduces his name and the date, not of his death, but of the first of the three days of his mausar.

The extravagant feast usually sends Kalbeliya families into debt, but even so, each Kalbeliya family must spend on the mausar, before other essentials like food, clothing, and shelter. When Kalbeliyas are asked about the reason behind such impressive but necessary destruction of wealth, they say that they celebrate mausar ‘nāk ke liye’, which basically means ‘in order to save face’, and they explain that it is a matter of izzat,12 reputation, honour. However, their answer still does not really explain how and why their reputation depends so strictly on the mausar.

According to Snodgrass, an extreme form of competition lies at the heart of the mausar, together with an attempt to distinguish oneself hierarchically from the other caste members: the mausar would basically represent a display of status.13 Snodgrass’s statement, applied to the Kalbeliya experience, can only partly be held true: the mausar for the Kalbeliyas is certainly a matter of reputation, but I do not think that it is a way to display their social and material status. First of all, it should be noticed that displaying social and material wellness is not part of the Kalbeliya’s attitude. In general, the members of the Kalbeliya community living in the Pushkar settlement think that through the displaying of their poverty they can obtain several material advantages: not only in their relationship with the foreign tourists who come to Pushkar, but even with Indian people and with the members of their own caste and their own family, they always admirably fill the role of poor people. They are, in fact, convinced that people, whoever they may be, will comply with their requests only out of sympathy for their poverty. I would therefore not go so far as to state that the mausar is about showing a wellbeing and wealth that they are constantly trying to hide. On the contrary, I think that the sponsoring of the mausar is strictly related to what may be called the moral economy and the ‘highly personal

12. An interesting analysis of the concept of izzat, applied to the Baluchi society, can be found in Fabietti 2004, 139-43. It must also be noticed that the Hindi word nāk that literally means ‘nose’ also translates the word ‘honour’, ‘prestige’ in a figurative sense.
mechanism of mutual support’\textsuperscript{14} subscribed to by the Kalbeliya community. Kalbeliyas are morally obliged, if asked, to help out and share their wealth with needy members of their family and their caste. What Randeria writes about Dalit castes in Gujarat proves to be very true with regard to the Kalbeliyas:

To insult a man who refuses to host a mortuary feast for his father or mother by saying that he eats [his wealth], but does not feed [it to others] (...) is to accuse him not only of stinginess but of sheer immorality. The purpose of acquiring wealth is not individual private consumption but public redistribution.\textsuperscript{15}

Kalbeliyas are morally obliged to share every kind of goods, from food to money. According to my experience, Kalbeliyas never refuse to lend money to a member of their own caste, and since denying a loan is shameful for the person who does not fulfil the request for money, Kalbeliyas will never try to borrow money from a member of their caste if they are not sure whether he or she has some money. On many occasions, I have bought special food, the kind of food they never buy, such as fruits, almonds, pistachios, honey, rice, etc. for the Kalbeliyas I am close to, and they have always, even if sick or seriously in trouble, shared my gifts with the members of their joint families. Very rarely have I ever seen anyone hiding my gifts to avoid having to share them. Therefore, once again in Randeria’s words, for Kalbeliyas ‘the mere hosting of a mortuary feast to honour one’s deceased parent is no virtue, but a \textit{sine qua non} of belonging to the community’.\textsuperscript{16} The \textit{mausar} is based on a moral economy, whereby lavish spending on a socially valued event in which the entire caste participates is considered productive and moral, while individual personal consumption is barren. Between the end of \textit{barah din} and the celebration of \textit{mausar}, the sons of the dead person are subjected to lots of restrictions: they cannot spend money on anything before they sponsor their father’s \textit{mausar}, and until they are able to sponsor it, they will constantly be blamed by the whole Kalbeliya society.

Not only do Kalbeliyas generally consider themselves first and foremost as part of a social body more than independent individuals, but they basically level their individual self-identity to that of their caste. Quite interestingly, it has been stressed that this mechanism of quasi-fusion between individual and collective identities intensifies when there is a marked difference between the group the individual belongs to and the outside,\textsuperscript{17} and also when identity salience comes through defining the group’s identity against other groups.\textsuperscript{18} Both these conditions apply to the experience of the Kalbeliyas living in the Pushkar’s settlement. Based on my familiarity with these Kalbeliyas, I would state that it is difficult for them to perceive themselves as different from their social group and, although they yearn for the social approval of the members of their own caste, they accord no importance to the judgement of third parties who do not belong to it. Pushkar, the most important and famous Rājasthānī tīrtha, is socially and culturally pervaded and even ruled by Brahmanical values and morals to such an extent that socially sanctioned behaviour is the one inspired by Brahmanical orthodoxy. Not only do the members of the Kalbeliya community make almost no attempt to conform to the Brahmanical behaviour patterns, but they actually openly challenge and defy them. Their explicit autonomy from brahmanical policy in Pushkar draws wide criticism, disapproval, and reproach, which however does not seem to bother the members of the caste at all. On the contrary, the Kalbeliyas, prompted by brahmanical social and cultural hegemony, proudly highlight their singularity and peculiarity, reiterating and reaffirming their unique social and cultural identity. If conformity of behaviour with regard to the body of social conventions does indeed constitute a strong marker of identity, then it follows that opposition to these conventions is also a solid identity statement. It is now clear that belonging to the Kalbeliya caste is not a mere matter of birth and blood: Kalbeliya caste identity depends on involvement in a social network of relationships and on agreement with a moral and ethical system of values. This agreement is testified by the actual behaviour of the members of the caste: individual identity is defined by the individual’s membership within a community and for a given caste, and hence it results in conformity in terms of behaviour within each community.19

Communitarian cohesion and the socially imposed and prescribed solidarity are the driving forces behind most of the behaviours of the members of the community: for example, if a group of Kalbeliya women go together to Pushkar from the camp (ḍerā) where they live, and when they are at the town’s market, one of them manages to earn some money from a tourist, perhaps by drawing a henna tattoo for example, she has to share her earnings with all the women who went with her to Pushkar before they return home. Or, if a Kalbeliya living in the Pushkar settlement is admitted to hospital, the members of his/her joint family and a good share of the Kalbeliyas living in the Pushkar camp will bed down outside the hospital until the Kalbeliya patient is discharged. The patient’s family has to pay for the daily food and tea of all the members of the caste camping outside the hospital. The reader may now appreciate how Kalbeliya cohesion can be both a relief and at the same time a huge burden for the members of the caste. Throughout their lives, Kalbeliyas are used to behaving and thinking first as members of a community rather than as an individual with his/her own needs and ambitions. The mausar can ideally be considered the final step of an education through which people are taught to subordinate their own needs to the promotion of the social wholeness of their community.

Moreover, the behaviour of the caste members is supervised and continuously questioned by the community they belong to: all the aspects of their life, be it their attire or their means of living, are implicitly or openly judged, and whenever their conduct is considered to be inappropriate and not in compliance with the caste’s moral and ethical code, the pāṇḍīcyat intervenes, fining or expelling the transgressor from the caste. It must be noticed that Kalbeliyas allow members of other endogamous groups to join their caste and to become Kalbeliyas: of course, due to the low status of the caste, this does not happen very often, but it is however possible. In fact, during my fieldwork period in Rajasthan I met two men, an Indian and an Australian, who had succeeded in becoming Kalbeliyas. The main reason and perhaps the only one that can push people to acquire Kalbeliya caste identity is marriage. Even today, Kalbeliyas do not allow marriages outside the caste, and if a Kalbeliya marries someone belonging to another caste, whatever this caste may be, he or she is cast out by the pāṇḍīcyat. Nevertheless, inter-caste marriages are gladly accepted when the non-Kalbeliyan half of the couple agrees to give up his or her original social belonging and to become a Kalbeliya.

Kalbeliya identity is constructed by social agents, according to an interactionist rationale that is based on the expectations that group members have about their roles. As Claude Dubar suggests, ‘identity is nothing else but a result (...) of diverse processes of socialization which at the same time construct the individuals and define the institutions’,

And the mausar is precisely an example of such a process of socialization: by sponsoring a mausar, Kalbeliyas prove their compliance with the caste’s moral code, its values, its beliefs, and its ethical thinking and show that they behave accordingly. The mausar is based on feelings of social belonging which sustain the group’s existence: in other words, the mausar feeds those feelings of social belonging which reiterate caste identity. Besides being, as Snodgrass states, a memory machine which constructs images that freeze the dead into a perfect and durable form, the mausar can also be considered an identity building machine, inasmuch as identity is understood, in accordance with the most recent research in sociolinguistics, social psychology, and cultural studies, as a performative act, realized when people expose who they are in specific social interactions.

Identity is a negotiated process of exposure and interpretation of social positions, affiliations, roles, and status. During the celebration of the mausar, the main features of Kalbeliya identity are explicitly and consciously displayed. On this occasion, the Kalbeliyas act as paradigmatic householder Nāths: their attire, the food, the very place where the mausar is held, the linguistic strategies adopted, the dancing, and the music are all aspects that convey the ideal image of the caste as it is perceived by its members. The mausar represents Kalbeliyas as they are supposed to be according to their own inner representation of themselves. One example of this paradigmatic performance of Kalbeliya identity is offered by the way the Kalbeliyas greeted each other during the mausar I attended. The usual Kalbeliya greeting, at least for those living in the Pushkar settlement, is ‘Rām Rām’ or more rarely namaste. Nevertheless, during the three days of celebration of the mausar, the Kalbeliyas addressed each other saying ādes, the common greeting formula used by members of the Nāth sampradāya.

20. Adoption of Kalbeliya caste identity first of all entails changing one’s name and paying a sum of money to the pāṇḍīcyat. The amount is fixed by the pāṇḍīcyat itself and is supposed to be redistributed among the members of the Kalbeliya community the person will join.

In the period between 2005 and 2011, this was the first time I had ever heard Kalbeliyas uttering this word, which in fact I expected them to use being distinctive to the Nāths, be they ascetics or householders. It goes without saying that after this mausar experience I never heard it again.

As Bloch states, the mausar therefore proves that ‘death as disruption, rather than being a problem for the social order, (...) is in fact an opportunity for dramatically creating it’.

25 The mausar presents the social fabric, which has been torn apart by the death of a member, as a coherent whole, ruled by moral and ethic feelings. The funeral feast is the occasion for the reproduction, rebuilding, and reiterating of the caste as a meaningful, ordered group fed by its members’ sense of belonging.

The idea that the mausar confirms and restores the structure of the Kalbeliya caste and the roles of its members is further suggested by the custom of celebrating sagāīs, betrothal and formalizing marriages during this funeral feast. There are two main reasons that generally underlie the connection between the two rituals: an economic one and a social one. Economically speaking, the co-celebration eliminates the cost of re-inviting and entertaining the same guests, and thereby reduces expenses for the family hosting the mausar. In turn, the social motivation concerns both the status of the deceased person’s family within the caste and the enhancement of the caste bond. Marriage is, in fact, an opportunity for families to maintain their social rank, to distinct socially and to receive social approbation from the other members of the community. As briefly explained above, families must respect caste rules and norms regarding weddings under constraints of dishonour and non-social esteem. Marriages, which promote and finalize new alliances within the caste, enlarge the social network on which the caste is based and sustained. Moreover, a third evocative explanation has been suggested by some Pushkar inhabitants who, when questioned about this low caste tradition, explained that marriages are formalized during the mausar in order to balance the inauspicious (āśubh) character of the mortuary feast through a highly auspicious celebration (śubh), such as a wedding.

Considering death an unavoidable rite of passage, consisting of the classic tripartite sequence outlined by Van Gennep and made up of the three phases of separation, transition, and incorporation, the Kalbeliya mausar undoubtedly acts as the last of the three ritual phases. The mausar is a rite of incorporation, where the purpose of the shared meal is to reunite, in a meaningful framework and structure, all the surviving members of the group. In fact, the main action connected to the mausar is eating, as is testified by the expression mausar khānā, which is used to describe the act of taking part in the celebration. As Parry, Inden and Nicholas have underlined, food is a key symbol of nurture and kinship, and the refusal to eat is a repudiation of kinship, where outcasting is expressed above all in a withdrawal from commensality. According to both Van Gennep’s well-known model and to Inden’s and Nicholas's interpretation of the Hindū samskāra function, the main aim of Kalbeliya funeral rituals, in common with all rites of passage, is to provide the subject of the rite with a new identity. In fact, apart from its socially unifying function, the Kalbeliya mausar, as the very last funeral ritual, provides a new identity to all the ritual actors involved therein: the deceased, the sponsors, and the caste. The dead person is, in fact, transformed into a perfect and paradigmatic householder Nāth, a model and epitome of caste membership; his sons are identified and legitimated as Kalbeliyas not through a mere blood-birth tie, but through the moral and social acknowledgement bestowed on them by their community, and, finally, the caste is renewed, rebuilt, and restated by the sense of belonging of its members and through the maintained prominence of its moral code on individual needs, desires, and aspirations. It is worth remembering that until a very recent past, the samādhīs were the only fixed, stable structures built by Kalbeliyas, and the only fixed signs of their presence on the Rājasthānī landscape. Samādhīs outline and sketch out the history of the caste in the region: they are documents that produce the caste as a local community and testify to its ongoing biography. It can be noticed that the present shifting of the Kalbeliya community living in Pushkar to a kind of sedentarization is mirrored by the confluence of all the samādhīs in a single area. Samādhīs are the signs which prove that the society of the living regularly recreates itself, and that the individual’s ability to influence and interact with the world does not end with biological death.

In conclusion, by sponsoring the mausar, the Kalbeliyas subscribe to a moral community, that is to say, a community of people who share the same values and the same behaviours: by sponsoring this celebration, they prove that

29. ‘every samskāra is regarded as a transformative action that “refines” and “purifies” the living body, initiating it into new statuses and relationships by giving it a new birth’, ibid., 37.
they endorse and are part of a cultural and social framework of values. This fact of being established within the same moral norm shapes their concept of izzat: the same values and the same behaviours that outline the group as a moral community define their idea of izzat, honour. The reproduction of these values, as proved by the mausar, is highly pragmatic, since it occurs through appropriate and morally fitting behaviours handed down to caste members of the same and of different generations. The mausar is therefore a matter of izzat, inasmuch as it is a matter of endorsing the values and the behaviours on which the moral community of equals is based.
